Wind tunnel tests have been widely used to predict the wind-induced responses of bridges, as well as to estimate wind loading. Because the bridge model scale is much smaller than the actual bridge, it is difficult to satisfy the Reynolds number similitude, so it is usually disregarded, based on the fact that the flow pattern may not change significantly with the different Reynolds numbers if the bridge and its members consist of sharp edges.

Wind Tunnel Test Engineer

Wind tunnel, device for producing a controlled stream of air in order to study the effects of movement through air or resistance to moving air on models of aircraft and other machines and objects. Provided that the airstream is properly controlled, it is immaterial whether the stationary model under testing is designed to move through the air, as an aircraft, or to withstand wind pressures while standing in place, as a building.

In wind engineering, wind tunnel tests are used to measure the velocity around, and forces or pressures upon structures. Very tall buildings, buildings with unusual or complicated shapes (such as a tall building with a parabolic or a hyperbolic shape), cable suspension bridges or cable stayed bridges are analyzed in specialized atmospheric boundary layer wind tunnels.
